3	“Some weather for Thanksgiving, eh, Kevin?” Grandma said, her voice seeming to literally break the ice in the freezing living room. It was silent except for three sounds; the creaking of the house straining against the wind, the whick, whick of Grandma’s knife as she whittled another of her wooden dwarves, and Kevin’s teeth chattering. “Not a good night for people to be out,” she murmured, almost to herself.
4	Kevin and his parents had left their apartment in Boston extra early that morning, because it was beginning to sleet. By the time they got on the highway, it was nearly a blizzard, cars fishtailing everywhere until the whole highway slowed to thirty-five miles an hour. The two-hour trip to Cape Cod ended up taking six, and they assumed they would be the last to arrive. But as soon as they stepped into Grandma’s wonderful-smelling but chilly entryway, she called from the kitchen:
